A diplomatic deal on Nagorno-Karabakh is the wisest path to take

A diplomatic accord with Armenia would benefit the region and Europe, writes Azerbaijan's foreign minister.

With oil at more than $115 a barrel, and the global market on tenterhooks, there is virtual inaction by the major consumer countries of the West to resolve a simmering conflict less than 20 km from the world's second-longest oil pipeline.

The Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline bringing Caspian oil to the Mediterranean and western markets through Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Turkey skirts the conflict zone of Nagorno-Karabakh – the internationally-recognized Azerbaijani territory currently under Armenian occupation. World energy security, as well as the stability and economic prosperity of the Caspian region, now demands that the long-running dispute over Karabakh, part of Europe's new neighbourhood, is settled.

My country is not only resource-rich; we have systematically attempted to embed ourselves in multilateral structures and negotiations. Azerbaijan is determined to see its territorial integrity restored in the near future. Over two decades, almost a million of our people have been displaced by a foreign occupying force.

A resolution will not just benefit us. Armenia too will see its international isolation ended. Its borders with Azerbaijan will be opened, with all the prosperity that will follow lucrative east-west trade and transport. Regional powers – Iran and Turkey – will benefit from decreased instability in their neighbourhood, and Europe will gain stable partners in the region, with one less haven for trans-national threats.

As for Russia, its interests in the region for once converge very well with those of the EU. As one of the biggest foreign direct investors in our countries, Russian businesses will benefit from stability, transparency, and predictability in the South Caucasus.

Despite phenomenal economic progress in Azerbaijan, our full potential – and thus the full potential of the Caspian region – cannot be realised while the conflict remains unresolved. The occupied areas are also havens for illegal transnational activity, money laundering and drug and arms trafficking, which directly affects the citizens of European countries as well as the states in the region.

On 15 April, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed clear support for Azerbaijan's full sovereignty and called for more political will to achieve resolution. The NATO alliance at its summit in Bucharest earlier this month agreed that peace in Karabakh must be realized quickly and within the borders of Azerbaijan. In March, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution reaffirming Azerbaijan's territorial integrity and explicitly calling for the withdrawal of all Armenian forces.

This widespread support is partly based on the nature of the Armenian occupation. Today's uncertain status quo rests on a foundation of ethnic cleansing comparable to that which occurred in Bosnia or Kosovo. Azerbaijan and the international community cannot tolerate the continued, systematic eradication of Azerbaijani culture and Muslim tradition in the occupied areas. Staring down Armenian forces over a shaky ceasefire line inside our internationally recognized territory is no longer a workable reality. They must leave and the displaced people return.

Azerbaijan proposes a final offer to Armenia. We support full autonomy for Karabakh within Azerbaijan. Our priority is diplomacy, but we keep all options on the table when it comes to restoring the full sovereignty of Azerbaijan.

Elmar Mammadyarov is the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Azerbaijan.

Letter dated 8 May 2008 from the Permanent Representative of Tunisia to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General

With reference to General Assembly resolution 57/265 on the establishment of the World Solidarity Fund adopted on 20 December 2002, and to paragraph 23 (h) of the September 2005 World Summit Outcome document whereby the Heads of State and Government resolved to operationalize the World Solidarity Fund, I have the honour to inform you that, at a formal ceremony in Tunis on 29 April 2008, in the presence of Mr. Nicolas Sarkozy, President of the French Republic, Mr. Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, President of the Republic of Tunisia, urged the international community to join in the global solidarity effort aimed at shielding humankind from the impact of soaring prices of oil and commodities on the world market (see annex).

I should be grateful if you would arrange for the present letter and its annex to be circulated as a document of the General Assembly under agenda item 58 (a).

Appeal from Mr. Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, President of the Republic of Tunisia, urging the international community to join in the global solidarity effort

"I must draw your attention to the warning signs of extremely complicated economic and financial problems in the making as a result of soaring oil and commodity prices, especially the prices of grains, that some countries have even decided to stop exporting. This is likely to spark famine anew in the poorest countries of the world, cause further marginalization and exclusion and have adverse consequences for human dignity and threaten the very survival of humankind in many areas of the world; the situation could be further aggravated by wars, devastating conflicts and natural disasters the impact of which is unpredictable.

Given this precarious situation, we call on all oil-rich countries to join in the global solidarity effort in order to protect humankind from the above-mentioned risks by allocating a dollar from every barrel of oil sold, as we have proposed, to the World Solidarity Fund established by the United Nations and to serve similar humanitarian goals.

We also urge international financial, economic and trade institutions to pay greater attention to policies geared towards the production of crops for human consumption, since the right to food is synonymous with the right to life and is an integral element of basic human rights which must be guaranteed for all. It is morally reprehensible to make the right to food subject to commercial concerns, convert crops grown for human consumption into biofuels or to speculate in crops grown for human consumption on the world market."
